• Assistive Technology Retrospective

I started my career as an occupational therapist treating infants and children with cerebral palsy and developmental disabilities. It was the late 1960s and there were so many challenges; spasticity, low tone, respiration, feeding. The list was endless and included all the things occupational therapists are called upon to help with. The ultimate goals were interacting with the environment and communicating. Our resources were so limited.

Fast forward. Sometime in the 1970s some clever folks adapted battery operated toys to be used with electric switches of various sizes and types. Now we could teach cause and effect. Then came communication devices, primitive at first, becoming more and more sophisticated over time. And now, those clever folks have now adapted devices for computer access for environmental interaction, communication and learning. What a difference this is making.

You can browse our latest selection of adapted toys, switches, communication devices and devices for computer devices. Be sure to look at the Peek-a-Boo Bear, he's engaging and always willing to play peek-a-boo with you!
